sensitivity to the details of physical world and to the whole world as a living organism has taught many how to observe nature and how to value it. No one could observe the natural world more perceptively than Thoreau. He knew that we need nature ("In wildness is the preservation of the world:), and he knew that we could destroy it.

Walden; or, Life in the Woods, by Henry David Thoreau (1854)

Kraus accordingly picks up the lifeworld term, adds the term "life conditions" (German Lebenslage) and opposes the two terms to each other. By this means, lifeworld describes a person's subjectively experienced world, whereas life conditions describe the person's actual circumstances in life.
