novels: The Famished Road, Songs of Enchantment, and Infinite Riches. The premise of the study is the elision of the womanâ€™s experience from the writing of the male African prose artist and the paucity of critical output on Okri as an artist who contests gender positions. The underlying objectives of this study are to show that Okri

Woman of the Aeroplanes, The Famished Road, and Wizard of the Crow, respectively. I argue that, in these novels, magical realism is not merely a literary mode; rather, it is an aesthetic of necessity. In other words, its use by these postcolonial African writers is dictated by the kind of issues they address in their works.
